How to Use Retinol and Vitamin C Together in Your Skincare Routine

Dermatologists weigh in on how to use these two different serums in your daily regimen.

The benefits of combining vitamin C and retinol

Before we get really deep into combining the two ingredients, let's examine their differences. Retinol is a form of vitamin A, which promotes skin cell turnover and boosts collagen production. You'll commonly find it in skincare products which aim to refine skin texture (like fine lines and mild acne) and even out skin tone. Pure vitamin C (aka L-ascorbic acid) is an antioxidant, which also increases collagen production and promotes even skin tone, but it fights free radicals in the environment (think: pollution) which are known to make skin appear dull, too. In short, they offer a range of benefits for a multitude of skin types.

Separately, vitamin C and retinol are strong ingredients, and when used in high concentrations (or incorrectly) they can be irritating — and that's where the "retinol at night, vitamin C during the day" mantra comes in. "Generally we advise clients to use vitamin C in the daytime, taking advantage of its antioxidant power to protect against environmental aggressors, then use retinol at night to promote cell turnover and support skin's repair process," says Anna De La Cruz, licensed esthetician and VP of Product Development and Global Education at Glo Skin Beauty.

Can I use retinol and vitamin C together?

Both Dr. Engelman and Dr. Mraz Robinson say yes, retinol and vitamin C should both absolutely be a part of your skincare routine. Having retinol and vitamin C in your skincare regimen is a great idea since both are powerful anti-agers that address skin appearance as well as skin health.

"These ingredients are a dream team for tackling dullness, fine lines, hyperpigmentation, acne and acne scarring, and overall skin aging," says Dr. Mraz Robinson, noting that vitamin C and retinol are the two ingredients she recommends most to her patients. "From a health perspective, vitamin C neutralizes free radicals and stressors on the skin, while retinol helps the skin to shed unhealthy and potentially precancerous skin cells, so they're very complementary."
